

Praise for Launching A New Worship Community

As existing congregations have tried to reboot their worship services after the pandemic they have discovered what church planters have known for decades. Starting, restarting, and sustaining viable worship services is hard work. Authors, Paul Nixon and Craig Gilbert in partnership with fourteen other church planting practitioners have written Launching A New Worship Community to offer resources for both new and established congregations as they plant or replant a variety of worship services. This book is both philosophical and practical. So, it references not only why launching new worship communities is both biblical and theological, but also how launching those communities is attainable. Launching A New Worship Community is a great tool to remind us that even though our worship practices might vary stylistically or denominationally, our biblical and theological worship principles remain consistent.
